Netanyahu's comments came at the behest of Jewish Home leader Naftali Bennett, who had previously expressed concern that the government would not be able to deliver on its promises for the peace process. "If no one does something, in the worst case scenario there may be very strong consequences, which is what the prime minister said, that a state of exception might be required," Bennett told Yedioth Ahronoth. Bennett was also one of the first members of the right-wing coalition to denounce Netanyahu's statement.

A senior official at the Prime Minister's Office declined to comment to Haaretz when asked about the comments by Deri. "We have not seen this yet. We haven't read it, nor will we see it today," the official said, citing the Prime Minister's Office's policy of not commenting on ongoing state of affairs.. "They were evacuating and we were staying in their house ... there were two of us," he recounted.. The comments from Israeli Interior Minister Aryeh Deri came just nine months after Netanyahu's election as Prime Minister, in which Deri led opposition politicians in opposing Netanyahu's Likud party from within the ruling coalition and helped derail the negotiations between him and his opponents on the formation of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's coalition..
